

Project Connect Light Rail Route Threatens Favorite UT Student Spots on Drag

Austin voters approved Project Connect two years ago, but University of Texas students are worried the light rail could change businesses, sorority houses and the streets of West Campus. Students' concerns include a fight to save restaurants like Whataburger, Halal Bros and Dirty Martin's.

Harry Styles Supporters Camp Out Despite Restrictions

A few weeks ago, Moody Center became Harry's House, but for some, to get the best seat in the house, that meant camping out overnight. UT prohibits camping on campus, but University Police did not make arrests due to questions about jurisdiction.

Nighttime Bicycle Riders Reunite Post-Covid

If you're looking for the motivation to exercise at the end of the week, you can join hundreds of Austin bike riders around downtown. The group gathers every Thursday night, ending at local bar The Jackalope.

OUR TOP STORY

UT Students Walk Out in Support of Reproductive and Trans Rights

University of Texas students walked out of their classrooms as part of the National Day of Student Action, a nationwide peaceful protest for reproductive rights and trans rights after the Supreme Court decision to overturn Roe v. Wade in June.

"Just seeing the range of speakers and organizations that we come from and all of the backgrounds is incredibly inspiring. Reproductive justice is such an intersectional issue, all of the perspectives here today."
